"It's an honor to be named firm of the year because the judges take into account each firm's body of work as well as involvement in the community," said Joyce Owens, the principal of the Fort Myers-based firm she founded in 2007. Studio AJO is a residential and commercial architectural, interior and design firm known for its modern designs and interiors adapted to Florida's tropical environment, a news release said. Ms. Owens was president of AIA Florida in 2018 and recently was elevated to fellowship of the American Institute of Architects. She serves on the national organization's Strategic Council, which advances the profession by informing the national organization's board of professional issues and opportunities. The top honor award for a commercial project was Studio AJO's outdoor concession facility for Bishop Verot High School in Fort Myers. "This new concession stand shows a respect for history of the site, while also demonstrating its contemporary heritage, elaborating rich materials with sleek lines and minimalist detailing. It doesn't compete with existing buildings, but rather complements them," the judges wrote. Studio AJO received the residential project top honor award for a singlefamily home on Sanibel Island. "A single-family home adapted to regional climate and landscape issues offers a rich theme. This home takes a clear position to these challenges, with a clear organization and expression that is restrained," according to the judges.
